

Monarchs Take Doubleheader.

The only variety introduced in the second day's schedule was that they had another team to offer up as a sacrifice to the mighty Kings. So the Aristos crew was brought forward. The name, you have probably noticed, is quite suggestive of something good to eat. In fact "Aristos" is the name of a patented flour. The Monarchs knowing this may well be suspected of trying to make doughnuts out of the nicely named team. So vigorously did the black boys attack the whites that it was feared that they may have had some faint intentions of practicing the Ancient Order of Cannibalism, which fictionists claim that we are the only group who ever indulged in such.

However, the game failed to reach that stage. The Monarchs simply took all the delicacies that the Aristos served and disposed of them in the way that seemed good to them. Skeets Alexander was on the mound for the flour dispensers. He, also, is one of the honorables. But he was far from being effective with the heavy hitting Monarchs. Rogan pitched for the colored boys. Of course the Aristos couldn't see the fast ones that this gent always slabs down. The result was the safe margin of 7 to 2.

Score by innings:

Second Game.

Again the Tramways faced the now haughty Monarchs. This time they went down the shut-out route. Donaldson didn't fool wth 'em, that is to say he did fool with 'em after he demonstrated his mastery. Chief Johnson was on the other end of the mound today, but the boys took well to all goods he offered and made it a blank for the Trams.
